Toto Comes Home

- The narrator's grandfather bought Toto for five rupees from a tonga-driver.
- His movements were nimble, quick and his tail served as a 'third hand'.

Toto is a Secret

- He was initially kept a secret from the narrator's grandmother by keeping tied up in a closet in the narrator's bedroom.
- Toto however managed to scrape and destroy the wallpaper.
- Toto was moved to a cage in the servants' quarters, where a few of pets lived together.
- Toto, however, would still not settle down and turned troublesome for rest pets.

Toto Takes a Trip

- Grandfather had to travel to Dehra Dun to collect his pension at Saharanpur and decided to take Toto with him in a canvas bag.
- Toto's attempts to escape the closed bag only led to the bag jumping about, attracting a curious crowd.
- At Saharanpur, Toto managed to push his head out, much to the ticket collector's surprise.
- Seeing this, the collector charged Grandfather an extra fee of three rupees meant for a pet dog aboard a train.

Toto At Home

- Once Grandmother came to know of Toto, he was moved to a cozier place in the stable.
- In winters, Toto loved a warm bath.
- Once, Toto jumped into a large kettle of water left to boil on the fire, grandmother found him and pulled him out.
- Toto's primary objective was to shred everything into tiny pieces.
- The narrator's family realised that they couldn't handle Toto's mischievous behaviour.
- Grandfather sold Toto back to the tonga-driver for only three rupees.
